ROUNDHOUSE ROUNDUP

"Zawww!" Papacito was hard at work at his favorite task, sleeping in a hammock between two shady trees. His sleep was rudely interrupted when Little Pancho Vanilla came dashing up to him in alarm.

"Papacito! Papacito!" Pancho panted. "Wake up, queek! A railroad boxcar carrying a beeg bool has rolled from the tracks and the bool has escaped!"

"Huh? What?" Papacito yawned sleepily. "A beeg boxcar has escaped from a bool?"

"I told the conductor that my Papacito was the most famous boolfighter in all of Chilivania and would be glad to catch the bool," Little Pancho added.

Papacito yawned and stretched again. "That ees fine, Little Pancho," he nodded. "You told the conductor that I would... I would WHAT?" Papacito was suddenly wide awake. "I, you want to catch thees bool?"

"Si, Papacito," Little Pancho nodded.

"But-but-but," Papacito stammered fearfully. "Uh, I mean, bools are out of season now. Si, that ees right." Papacito bobbed his head. "So therefore I cannot catch heem and weel go back to sleep... I mean work."

But before Panchó had a chance to lie down again, Little Pancho had grabbed him by the arm and was hurrying him to the railroad yard. A huge crowd had gathered.

"Come quickly, señor," the train conductor pleaded. "The bool has run down the tracks toward the roundhouse."

Papacito's eyes rolled from side to side and he wished that he could be safely back in his hammock. But upon seeing Little Pancho looking at him so proudly, he knew that he must face the bull.

"Everybody stand back!" he ordered bravely. "I go now to capture thees ferocious bool."

He strutted bravely down the tracks, but his heart almost stopped beating when suddenly the bull appeared before him and there was no place left to hide.

The great, glowering bull lowered his head and charged... in the other direction.

"What are you doing?" the train conductor called as Papacito whizzed past him.

"I am leading heem to a safe place for capture so nobody weel get hurt," Papacito panted. "Especially me," he added under his breath.

"Turn around and head for the roundhouse," the conductor called. "When you are both inside, we weel close the doors."

Papacito did as he was advised, and soon he and the bull were inside the roundhouse and the conductor had closed the doors.

"Yikes! I'm trapped!" Papacito shouted with alarm as he kept on running.

Around and around and around the roundhouse the bull chased Papacito. But in a few minutes the bull became so dizzy that he fell to the ground in a faint.

Papacito, who was more frightened than dizzy, immediately grabbed a rope and tied the bull up safely.

"Open the doors," he called to the conductor. "I have captured the bool."

"How did you ever do it?" the conductor asked later as the people lifted Papacito to their shoulders and cheered.

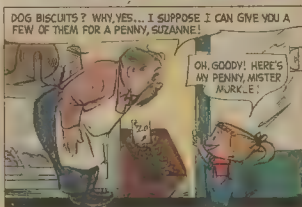

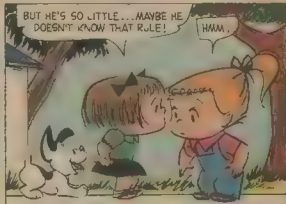

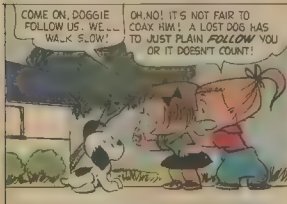

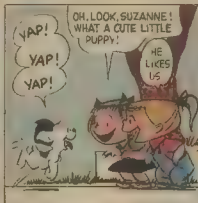

"Oh, ees was nothing," Papacito panted modestly. "I just went about ees een a round-about way!"
